How to sound like autotune

Autotune is an extremely popular tool that is used in pop songs, rap songs and even in certain rock songs to measure and alter pitch in vocal recordings, instrumentals and performances. In the video above, Vaughn Levi re-creates the hook from Pop Smoke’s “The Woo” using Autotune on his natural recorded voice. If you are trying to recreate your favorite hit song, you will need to download the instrumental track. From here you must know the song’s BPM and Key. You can download BPM Analyzer which is a free computer program that will give you the BPM of your song, along with Keyfinder which will give you the key of the song. Note that in this instance, “The Woo” is in the key of Gm (G Minor). However, sometimes when you use the Keyfinder in Soundtrap, you may have to try out both G major & G minor to test which one sounds the best. In this case, G major sounds better with Vaughn Levi’s voice and the song. You will use these tools to effectively use the Autotune function in Soundtrap (more on that below). Auto-tune catches some flack by music purists who don’t appreciate the digital alteration of musician’s voices. But for Emma Robinson, her auto-tune sound has nothing to do with putting her amazing voice through a computer — her incredibly gorgeous voice is all natural. Yup, this Florida based 18-year-old has a unique inflection that makes it sound like her voice has been put through an auto-tune program, but it hasn’t. In a video she uploaded to YouTube Monday, she belts out Tori Kelly’s “Paper Hearts,” and the neat vocal technique is so clear that her cover is going viral. Emma is a serious talent. Her Instagram page is also full of beautiful snippets of her incredible singing voice. Even something as brief as Vine showcases her amazingness. We have a sneaking suspicion we’ll be hearing a lot more of Emma Robinson in the future.
