Implicit Intents

Indie-web actions focus mainly on social sharing and syndication of content, not currently thinking about the ecosystem of installed applications. The best way to think about what an intention is is an abstract description of an operation to be performed by the user. Standardizing around https:// One of the biggest problems with domain name interception is that a web origin hopes to own the domain and expects to control the address space it covers, and anything it intercepts is a bad actor. Registering a Service We want our web applications to be on equal terms on the user's device, so we need some way of defining the capabilities of the web experience so that the operating system and other platforms can present our sites as an option for the user to integrate with them. Ideally, this should go back to the Twitter site. For many pre-approved schemas, the browser can also register a web application to handle the custom schema so that every time the URL is clicked on a website or in an application on the user's system, it will open the website. General problems on all platforms (Web and Native): Zero trust: A user sees a link and clicks on it. intent:#Intent;package=com.twitter;end There is so much you can do with the intent: URL format, but the most important thing to remember is that the intent: syntax has abstracted away the underlying means to discover the service, as a developer I can put in any constraint I want and the system will work it out for me and find an application that can handle it or go back to a web solution. I recently described a solution in "Service Discovery and Web Application Interactions", but to summarize: Give the user a choice of what service they want to use on the web or native. Let the developer direct a service, but go back to the system if it's not available. I'm not sure if I'm sharing something) to a normal URL so it works across platforms. Does not require JS to make it work in all browsers (progressively improving). Can improve until intention: syntax to integrate with native platforms when supported I think the biggest part I missed is that a solution should require minimal change and impact on the existing ecosystem, every URL schema should still work. Mobile support is very weak: no mobile browser that I know of allows web applications to participate in the custom schema ecosystem, most mobile browsers also do not allow a site to register in any "spec allowed" schema. I recently discovered a small way around the custom schema problem by taking advantage of the old "https" URL and they work very well. An intentional URI has the following layout (all optional - heh):

intentional: HOST/URI-path // Optional Host #Intent; package=[string]; action=[string]; category=[string]; component=[string]; scheme=[string]; type=[string] S.*=[string]; end; The interesting thing to me is that it is just a URL, but it still bridges the gap between the Web-based APIs registerContentHandler and registerProtocolHandler. Consider the following: intent:#Intent;scheme=tel;end - this would mark the UK talking clock and is equivalent to tel:+44123. At this point, the web cannot play on the intent: URL space, the browser does not respond to the intent: unless it is called directly through the system.

A URL allows you to target a site or an application and transmit data, and then see a result in some form. If we open a new window, we can post, if we don't open a new browser window, we can also post and put them in, etc. using standard rest semantics, and web problems, the browser in particular is a second-class citizen in this ecosystem. Both Android and Apple have templates for a site owner to claim that their application is capable of owning an entire URL space. But they also have problems. For one, the action schema must actually be a Web+ action in order to be policed. No native application will register this, so no link only a URL can be dynamically replaced in the URL by a single% s What is a good solution? I want to open a video in a custom application? The solution proposed here is not without its problems. A site should be to register the current site imperatively as a handler for an action, perhaps by means of an API such as Navigator.registerHandler. A site needs to be able to declaratively present the services it can offer quite likely through the final thoughts of the Web App. Open to any solution that helps solve the problems we have and brings the web and apps together; but I believe the solution has to work well in existing ecosystems, ecosystems.
